In one of the most high profile sex trafficking cases ever in the United States, the woman has come forward to testify and details how she was sexually exploited while working in a brothel in California. She was raped and forced into prostitution in a number of states before she was put on a bus, and forced to travel the country on her own, she was then deported by the US government back to Mexico, and there she was once again forced into prostitution. At one point, she was found by Mexican police and was taken back to the US to testify for a Canadian man, Leonard Heligg. It was during this trial that the plaintiff's lawyers learned that she had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder and post-traumatic stress disorder has caused memory loss. During the cross-examination of the plaintiff, the Canadian lawyer would have wanted her to answer the question of whether she had turned in those traffickers to the police, but her lawyer was allowed to have her answer 'No' in court. The question of whether sex trafficking victims can be cross-examined is up in the air. After a long and tortuous trial, the Supreme Court ruled last month that women sex
