This invention relates generally to a system and method for capturing and/or modifying target regions of an image. More particularly, the invention relates to a system and method for capturing an image including a target region and capturing an image, having portions of the image for modifying, and then providing a modified image including the portions of the image for modifying. There are several techniques used to capture an image, such as a document image, including the following: a) scanning the document image in a scanning operation, b) capturing the document image with a camera, and c) capturing the document image with a camera and applying image modification techniques to the image. The scanning technique typically involves the use of a linear scanning device such as a flatbed scanner or a hand-held scanner that scans the document image. The scanned image is then stored on a computer in a raster image format. A raster image format stores images in a rectangular array of pixels. The scanning of a document image in a raster image format can be accomplished by a variety of scanning devices. For example, scanning devices used for scanning a document image include hand-held and flatbed scanner. A hand-held scanner typically includes a stylus used to pass over a document image. A flatbed scanner typically includes a flat platen and scanning device that moves over the document image while it is supported on the platen. Scanners typically perform a process known as "halftone" processing to capture an image of a target region or
