Kitchen cabinets are often essential for providing convenient storage space. Certain kitchen cabinets are configured with drawers that are generally mounted along one side thereof and accessed by the user via a hinged door. Such doors may be manufactured to provide a variety of latch mechanisms including those with over-center catches (OCC) that often allow the door to be pulled closed against a force resisting the door closing motion. OCC door latches are typically engaged by pulling down on the hinged door while simultaneously pushing against the door frame. Such devices can be designed to be mounted on a door frame or to be mounted in place within a drawer door frame to secure the drawer to the door frame. Drawer mount latches allow the user to draw a drawer closer to the cabinet without pulling down on the hinged door. A drawer pull handle is typically located at the bottom of the drawer to pull the drawer downward. Latches for drawer opening/closing may also be used in combination with drawer sliding systems. Sliding drawers are typically used in cabinets or in vehicle door panels that are subject to frequent opening and closing. A sliding drawer may be operated by pushing or pulling the drawer and a fixed or fixed drawer mount latch may be used to lock the drawer at a desired position. Various sliding drawer designs exist that provide for a fixed drawer mount and a drawer pull handle and are typically mounted on the front side of a cabinet door to allow the drawer to slide when opened to the closed position and to prevent it from sliding completely open. The sliding drawer also has a fixed latch or locks the drawer in the closed position to prevent the drawer from being pulled open. U.S. Pat. No. 6,105,824 to Aitch 77a5ca646e
