It provides the heart with a reservoir of elastic tissue for filling atrial and ventricular cavities. The pericardium contains receptors that respond to mechanical, thermal and chemical changes in the heart and body. It also appears to be the source of metabolic waste products such as purines. The pericardium is also the first barrier encountered by systemic blood flow after the heart has stopped beating. These studies demonstrate that the pericardium plays an important and necessary role in the normal functioning of the heart. Yet, the structure of the pericardium, the pericardial receptors and the metabolism of purines within the pericardium remain unclear. The pericardium is composed of 2 major layers, the outer epicardium and the inner fibrous pericardium. A single pericardium is composed of two pericardial chambers and several divisions. These data suggest that the different divisions of the pericardium may perform different functions. The purpose of this proposed work is to determine what morphological characteristics of the pericardium are responsible for the formation of the pericardial chambers and divisions. It is also important to know what role the elastic fibers have in the pericardium, how the elastic fibers are organized within the pericardium, and what receptor and metabolic activity is found in the pericardium. Finally, we would like to know how the purines contained within the pericardium are utilized and how the different pericardial layers are related to the circulatory system. These studies could help us understand the fundamental functional role of the pericardium,

and enable us to identify the potential basis
